Ⅳ. 次の文章を読んで、下の A・B の問いに答えなさい。

Do you like to be alone? Probably not, right? Well, you're not the only one. During the coronavirus pandemic, many people have struggled with loneliness. Needless to say, not being able to meet friends, to go to parties, or to participate in events is painful and depressing. Not surprisingly, the pandemic has seen an ^aincrease in suicides and mental illness. Unfortunately, some people hate to be alone, even for short periods of time. This should make clear, however, that it's extremely important to be able to enjoy being by yourself. Although the pandemic has been painful, it's also been a good opportunity for developing a healthier attitude about being alone.

To begin with, spending all of your time with family and friends can actually prevent you from understanding yourself. Most people are strongly ^baffected by what other people think of them, and even change their behavior to please their friends. This is especially true with teenagers, who tend to be very concerned with being popular. For example, most teenagers watch the same videos, use the same apps, and wear the same clothes as their friends. Few have unpopular or unusual hobbies and interests. As a result, some young people can't even express an opinion without first checking with their friends, and few have unique interests or skills.

Being alone, on the other hand, allows you to avoid the distractions that result from being in a group. In other words, when you're alone, you only have to please yourself, so you can do what you want, instead of just following the crowd. Of course, you should spend some time quietly reflecting and thinking, instead of just watching television or talking with friends on social media. In the long run, spending time alone will help you to know yourself better. This, in turn, will help you to develop confidence and a stronger sense of your identity. If you learn to enjoy your time alone, you'll end up being happier and more content.

So what are some healthy and positive things to do while you're alone? First, you should turn off the TV, turn off your cellphone, and ^cdisconnect from the world. Once you're relaxed, you can think about your values, dreams, and goals. Then you should start doing things that will make your dreams come true, such as studying for an exam or searching for a new job. You should also try something new: cooking, learning to play a new instrument, painting a picture, writing a story, or reading a new book. Life is an adventure, even when you're by yourself, so don't think of your time alone as a struggle; try to see that time as a fun and exciting opportunity!
